

Liquidity Risk Understand – Assess – Manage

In recent months, the European Securities and Markets Authority (ESMA) has brought greater focus and tougher scrutiny onto European investment fund managers (IFMs) for liquidity issues and related mismatches. Following a recent stress testing simulation study, ESMA has identified significant shortfalls in this area. Further negative headlines of major European investment vehicles defaulting on their payment obligations has amplified these concerns, leading to a series of regulatory actions at the European and national levels, starting with the CSSF's adoption of Circular 19/733 (the "Circular") setting out best practices on liquidity risk management for open-ended funds. In addition, ESMA has published its final report on stress testing guidelines, complementing the Circular with best practices for anticipating stressed markets. While broader in scope and covering all IFMs with only a few exceptions, it nonetheless provides for a more granular, principles-based assessment.

In light of recent regulatory developments, combined with a market infrastructure shaken to its core by COVID-19, liquidity risk is certain to be a key topic going forward.

How can we assist you?

Keeping pace with regulatory changes and practices is becoming increasingly challenging. The string of recent regulatory actions raises many questions that IFMs may need to answer in the near future, such as:

- ✓ Has the set of potential liquidity risk drivers for our funds been identified, and do we know what would constitute a suitable approach to monitoring them in normal and stressed markets?
- Is our risk management framework in line with regulatory requirements?
- ✓ Do we have proper governance in place in order to ensure efficiency?
